MESSAGE FROM Administration

One of the most important experiences adults can provide for children is to talk and listen to them.

-Ms. S. Cime, Counselor

Good communication involves listening and speaking in ways that make children feel important and valued. Children who grow up in families that talk about emotions are more academically successful, have better friendships, have fewer infectious diseases, and handle difficult social situations more effectively than children whose families that do not talk about feelings.

(Bornstein, M.H., 1995)

As your children grow up, good communication will make it easier for you to talk about real life situations. Developing good communication skills helps parents catch problems early, support positive behavior, and stay aware of what is happening in their children's lives.
